

What the Biden Administration Can and Should do in the South Caucasus

February 8, 2021

Related Categories: Democracy and Governance; Public Diplomacy and Information Operations; NATO; Caucasus; Turkey

Related Expert: Stephen Blank

"The advent of the Biden Administration provides an opportunity to give the South Caucasus the importance it deserves in U.S. foreign policy. The recent war over Nagorno-Karabakh has underlined the region's geostrategic importance, whereas the institutionalization of a Russo-Turkish rivalry/condominium raises the real possibility that another clash could trigger a confrontation between these two powers, one of whom is a NATO ally, as well as their proxies. Simultaneously, Georgia suffers from a drawn-out political conflict among the leading political parties. In this context, the new Administration and its allies in Europe should act to improve the West's position in the South Caucasus".

Continue reading here.